Answer: A

Explanation:

Explanation/Reference:

Manual Users must use either telnet to port 259 on the firewall, or use a Web browser to connect to port 900 on the firewall to authenticate before being granted access.

Partially Automatic If user authentication is configured for the service the user is attempting to access and they pass this authentication, then no further client authentication is required.

For example, if HTTP is permitted on a client authentication rule, the user will be able to transparently authenticate since FireWall-1 has a security server for HTTP. Then, if this setting is chosen, users will not have to manually authenticate for this connection. Note that this applies to all services for which FireWall-1 has built-in security servers (HTTP, FTP, telnet, and rlogin). # Fully Automatic If the client has the session authentication agent installed, then no further client authentication is required (see session authentication below). For HTTP, FTP, telnet, or rlogin, the firewall will authenticate via user authentication, and then session authentication will be used to authenticate all other services.
